

The distinct sensorial experience of New York City travels underground to the subway. The lights inside the train flicker and buzz as each car rocks to its own rhythm, sometimes violently, side to side, sending booming echoes bouncing off the tunnel walls. The relief felt from exiting the subway is only reacquainted with the ave ground urban chaos.

Moments of urban solitude are rare but they do occur, usually in specific locations at specific times.

Urban nightlife is already distinct, but the emergence of the digital era is developing a whole new sensorial experience.